Society is split in two—those who have embraced the differences in people, and those who have isolated themselves refusing to be a part of different cultures. This picture illustrates what it really is like to be on either of these sides. There is the dark side lacking uniqueness, where people don't approve of culture, and those different to them. In contrast, represented in the light are people who see the beauty of difference, of culture, and how the world should be. Anne Frank's famous quote; "How wonderful it is that no one need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world," can be interpreted in this case as embracing the beauty of culture and differences amongst people. Anyone can insert themselves into the center of this picture and help shine the light for the rest of us, showing us that the only color that matters is the color that comes from within.
